at the bottom of the great ridge of hills is laid some hills exceeding white.
below that a bottom of the hills is rock the hills chalk.

There was an equal a following below. London's collector now coming to one than about Mr. Fleet's return and his wife's arrival, again left, and so had scarcely got to the town when he was again called away.

Iffin wood W. of Stonehrost. upon the chalk down in the way to Chilham is very much intruded has great cavities in it & slopes down to them this is in the parish of Lower Hardres is what I apprehend Dr. Holland calls Cesars camp for nothing else of this sort can I find hereabouts & thence the name of this town here is the military rampart. nor is it likely that Caesar could have a camp hereabouts being entirely woody. I imagin he fought the Britons about Kingstow bridge where there are 2 arches the small but the river may be well covered to have been bigger, but as it runs on the w. side of the valley clos under the hill the ground on that side is considerably lighter than on the other which is made of this is what caesar speaks of the higher ground after he forced this pass where the river joins them at least to have swelled in an extraordinary manner to oppose the roman arms he drew him up into the woods thick hereabouts all intruded with wells in them so that its impossible to know which in particular, but it is to be thought he crossed the river to encamp on Barham downs for he could no where else hereabouts being entirely woods his business was to choose an open plain where he could see around to some distance & not be too suddenly surprized. this was his camp on Barham down most dividually roman small bec' he was but a little way off the coast & his ships whiche he could reheat upon the last extremity. the defence his men would make not very great but in it men being anxious prostastion omni. a mile E. of this place is another wood called Tywood beyond running toward Deal wher are full intruded with arches & caves under ground.
